Toike Writer Pens Article Relevant in January, Not Being Published Until February

This article was originally intended for the December edition of the Toike Oike TORON-TOIKE, ON-TOIKE-10 – In a first for the University of Toronto-based satirical newspaper, a writer has submitted an article that accurately reflects the political climate and popular culture in January. Unfortunately for the anonymous contributor, their article will not be published until February, reducing the once poignant piece to nothing but an obscure reference.

“Oh yeah, no. I loved it. Thought it was hilarious,” said a Toike senior staff member, “can’t wait to release this in the next few months.”

Heralded for its dark humour, emotionally-moving themes, and clever observations, the article was dubbed “a must read” by the Toike leadership and was killed early-on as a potential frontpage piece before it was put aside for several weeks. Currently located in the electronic junkfile named “Toike Content for Later,” directly forgotten writings.

“Yeah, man. We forget about a lot of our unused articles.”

Much to the chagrin of the unnamed writer, the January Toike is on newsstands this February.
